CAREGIVER INFORMATION GUIDE

DIRECT CARE OPTIONS

INFORMATION MY LOVED ONES NEED TO KNOW ABOUT ME
Caring for the people that once looked out for you is one tough job. At various times, you’ll have to act as an elder advocate, financial expert, nurse, doctor, housekeeper, cook and personal assistant. In addition to all this, you’re still the child to your parents.

Just remember to take care of yourself first and maintain your sense of humor, and remember you’re not alone. Nearly one in four American households includes someone who provides care for an aging parent, older relative or friend. Many have discovered that having a plan in place before it’s needed makes everything easier. If you wait for a crisis to force a quick decision, your options may be limited.

You might want to seek assistance from a case manager, referral service or similar professionals. It’s best if your care recipient participated in development of a plan, maintaining as much control as feasible. The goal is for your care recipient to remain as independent as possible for as long as possible.

It’s also a good idea to include other members of your family in the planning process. Doing so will help to avoid communication problems and conflicts later. Family conferences are the place to emphasize the need for flexibility, cooperation and shared responsibility.

Needs Assessment
The first step in developing an effective eldercare plan is determining the scope of the needs of the care recipient. Keep in mind that needs assessment is not a one-time deal; the situation is bound to change.

Professional help is available from case or care managers, who visit with you and the care recipient, help assess the need for outside services, and then recommend appropriate services. The best professionals can answer questions ranging from the effects of disease to insurance payments. Some case managers also make the initial contact with providers, coordinate services, monitor them periodically, and provide counseling. Fees vary.

Planning for Care
Once the care recipient’s needs are assessed, it’s time to look at options available to meet those needs. Talk with family members and close friends about what they might be able to contribute toward the care giving effort: time, skills, space, equipment, money and moral support.

You can’t do it alone; no one can. It’s important to define the tasks and agree upon them in advance to avoid difficulties later. Perhaps one person can prepare meals, one can do the yard work, one can provide beauty treatments and manicures, and another can provide transportation. Other tasks you might want to divvy up: making home repairs, cleaning the house, paying bills, balancing the checkbook, coordinating healthcare, and filling out tax forms.
Someone needs to gather basic information on the care recipient, as healthcare professionals will need this information. Include the Social Security number, Medicare ID number, insurance policies and numbers, doctors’ names and numbers, medications, allergies, family medical history, and lifestyle information (smoking, caffeine, alcohol, and sleep patterns). Keep the information handy in a wallet or on the refrigerator door. (A helpful questionnaire is included)

Once family and friends choose their responsibilities, you can tap into community resources to fill the eldercare gaps.

Support Groups
Besides the practical help, you will need all the emotional support you can muster. Caregiver support groups are an ideal place to share your concerns and feelings with others who understand and can offer solution options and moral support.

How do you get Mom to go for a thorough examination when she refuses, because she doesn’t see a problem? How do you convince your parent to give up driving? What if Dad insists he doesn’t need a wheelchair when he falls at least once a day? What if parents won’t share their personal financial matters? Getting parents to realize their increasing physical and mental limitations is a particularly thorny problem for families.

Care giving is stressful and probably one of the most difficult jobs you’ve ever had. The common desire to do everything you can for your loved one often leads to physical and emotional exhaustion. Financial and social stresses also take their toll. It’s imperative that you take good care of yourself or you’ll become ill and unable to provide help.

Most support groups are free or low cost and are led by a healthcare professional. Caregivers also can call information and assistance hotlines sponsored by local hospitals and nonprofits.

Assisted Living Choices
Even with your best efforts to manage the care for an aging or disabled relative there may come a time when Mom’ care needs increase and you need to consider moving her to an assisted living, memory care, or skilled nursing facility. The responsibility of 24 hour care may be more than you and your family members can manage. If this situation occurs case and care managers, attorneys, moving specialist and other professionals are available to assist you in choosing and relocating your parent to an appropriate care facility.

Remember, though it might not always feel like it, providing care for an aging parent can be extremely rewarding. It can bring you closer then you’ve ever been before. So, cherish the moments of joy. And don’t forget to laugh with your loved one, for without laughter, aging is no laughing matter.
